Commodity Prices, Sectoral Factor Allocation, and Deforestation: Evidence from Ghana

Olawoumi Alexis Atchade
University of Houston
Job Market Paper — 2026

Abstract

This paper examines the short-run supply responses of agricultural commodity producers to external price shocks and the environmental consequences of those responses. It focuses on how supply adjusts across several margins, including land allocation, input use, labor, agricultural production, and forest loss, particularly when competing producers face different constraints on their ability to respond to market conditions.

This page is a work in progress. Check back later for updates.